Mumbai, the financial capital of India, is struggling to sustain its position as an economic powerhouse due to increasing pressure for urbanization and declining quality of life. Furthermore, it is set to become the world’s largest city with a population of 44 million in four decades. The government realizes the need to set a long term vision and development directions for Mumbai, for which they called for the development of Concept Plan for Mumbai Metropolitan Region (MMR). The Concept Plan proposes break-through solutions for transforming MMR into a world-class metropolis with a vibrant economy and a globally comparable quality of life. Most importantly, it is expected to empower the region to be “one-step-ahead” when addressing future challenges in regional development. This long-term framework would guide development in the MMR for the next four decades and bring the region back onto the international stage for strategic investments and growth.
