Presentation by George Lueddeke: Achieving the UN-2030 Sustainable Development Goals through the ‘One World, One Health’ Approach
Many of the issues facing the 193 nations that in September 2015 agreed the UN 17 Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), present us with an ‘ingenuity gap,’ that is, finding solutions to unprecedented environmental, societal, economic and geopolitical problems.

In this presentation, based on his current book, Global Population Health and Well-Being in the 21st Century: New Paradigms, Policy and Practice, Dr Lueddeke briefly outlines some of the causes for the global impasses and highlights the vision and practical intents of the global UN SDGs (2016-2030). One of his key arguments is that achieving the targets set for the UN SDGs and public health specifically necessitates fundamental changes in our worldview especially in our approach to global and national population health and well-being. In short, fundamental transformations are required in how we conceptualise ‘public health,’ funding and enact change to ensure the sustainability of the planet and people. While there are no easy answers, the ‘One World, One Health’ concept would take us a significant step forward. However, citing William (“Bill”) Joy, co-founder of Sun Microsystems, he concurs that the most difficult challenge for us all remains, and that is, ‘as a species’ to ‘agree where we are headed, and why...’ in order ‘to make our future much less dangerous’ and ‘understand what we can and should relinquish.’

Non-psychotic conditions, especially depressive illness and anxiety, are common during pregnancy and postpartum. They have been shown to affect the infant’s mental health and have longstanding effects on the child’s emotional, social and cognitive development (JCP-MH, 2012). Serious perinatal psychiatric disorder is associated with an increased risk of suicide, and is a leading cause of maternal mortality (Oates & Cantwell, 2011). Perinatal mental health problems are a major public health concern and have impacts on both maternal and infant mental and physical health (JCP-MH, 2012).
