This session will be a working dialogue focused on how to make the Southern Sociological Society more representative of all sociologists in the South. Rather than be a panel of experts talking TO members, this workshop is designed to engage all members in meaningful conversation that produces actionable suggestions. A set of facilitators will provide direction and support as members work together in roundtable format to formulate ideas on how to increase diversity and inclusion in the SSS. The session will produce a list of actionable items from the membership that will be sent to the Executive Committee to be acted upon. We invite you to join us in beginning this most important discussion about the future of SSS membership and

Organizer and Presider: Andrea N. Hunt, University of North Alabama

Panelists:
- Andrea N. Hunt, University of North Alabama
Sociology as a discipline has a long tradition of theoretical and empirical research on parenting. This research is grounded in historical and contemporary notions of gender and the division of labor. How do gender and sexuality shape parenting in professional settings? How can we use our own disciplinary concepts and tools to address parenthood in academia? Within academia, parenting is embedded within different contexts and involves individual, interactional, and institutional processes that affect the meaning of parenting to women. This panel will address how parenting shapes and is shaped by our life in academia. The panelists will offer advice and strategies for balancing and negotiating parenthood and academia at various stages in your academic career.

Session 171. Research and Advocacy for Higher Ed's Precariat: Doing Public Sociology in the Academy (Sponsored by the Committee on Sociological Practice) - Workshop

Organizer and Presider: Marisa Allison, George Mason University

In recent years there has been an increased national focus on the growing number of non-tenure track faculty and the conditions in which they work. Tenured and tenure track faculty, who made up almost 60 percent of total faculty in 1975, are now only 25 percent of the professoriate. Non-tenure track faculty are the new faculty majority and research shows that they often lack equitable compensation (with many earning less than a living wage), with little to no benefits to their employment, are heavily relied upon to support the teaching needs of their institutions with little to no assurance of continued employment, have few advancement opportunities, and are given little support for their teaching and within their classrooms. Research has shown that hiring temporary faculty was initially a short-term solution to a set of larger problems in higher education, including a booming student population and a decline in government funding. It has now become the standard hiring method at colleges and universities across the nation.
This trend toward contingency is accompanied by several well-documented problems, including a decline in educational quality, lower graduation rates and less contact time between faculty and students, band-aid solutions to larger educational staffing problems such as reduced hiring standards, and the rise of what has been described as a "caste-based faculty system".
Non-tenure track faculty movements in the U.S. have largely occurred in states that have collective bargaining rights, though the employment conditions of contingent faculty members in so called "right to work" states is likely more egregious. This workshop, sponsored by the sociological practice committee, will address the ways in which sociologists are affected by these changes within the professoriate and how we can support efforts to improve working conditions on college and university campuses.

- Donald Gregory, Reinhardt University
Katrina Smith, Reinhardt University

Between them, Dr. Cheryl Brown and Dr. Donald Gregory have organized and led almost two dozen study abroad and international service-learning trips on three continents and 10 different countries. Whether working with indigenous groups in Mexico and Ecuador, examining the pro-democracy tsunami that swept across Europe in 1989 or observing the identity movements in Post-War Germany, students are exposed to the people, places, and ideas that have shaped some of the most powerful movements in the last several decades. This workshop will address the key decision making moments in planning one of the most powerful learning tools at our disposal –- taking students abroad. We'll cover everything from deciding if this trip is the best option, going solo or hiring a travel company, can there be a service-learning component, to balancing the tension between academics and fun. This workshop is open to everyone, from those considering a first-time trip abroad to the grizzled old veterans of such trips.

3:45 PM-5:00 PM  Session 287. Migration-Trust Networks: Social Cohesion in  St. Charles A Like many faculty at institutions of higher education, many of us received our PhDs from R1 Universities, in which we are trained to be academics. We were the top students in our undergraduate programs. Yet the reality is that most of us do not end up at teaching at research intensive schools. Some of our students struggle to get Cs in our courses and their career plans do not include becoming a professor. Data from the American Sociological Association notes that 60% of those graduating with Bachelor's degrees in Sociology do not go to graduate school (Spalter-Roth & Van Vooren, 2010) and that for those who do go directly to graduate school, more are in applied programs in social work, health, and policy (Spalter-Roth & Van Vooren, 2008). Yet, many times our teaching only reinforces the conceptual ideas of the field instead of helping students understand how not only these conceptions, but the skills they are learning, are useful in applied settings such as work or applied graduate programs. Research from the American Sociological Association also notes that we are doing a poor job in helping our students transition from undergraduate to careers or applied programs in graduate school. Internships, service learning, and related out of the classroom learning activities are suggested methods of improving students understanding of concepts by "doing Furthermore, they are also ways of helping students gain an edge in a tight job market, to document their skills on resumes, and to improve their satisfaction with their Sociology major and career choice (Finkelstein, 2010). While internships, service learning, and related experiences are great things for our students, how can we help students who are not going to graduate school in sociology, but into the workforce or applied graduate programs, understand how the material they are learning is applicable to the real world in individual courses or through our sociology programs? How do we help them conceptualize and document the critical skills gained in a sociology major and courses? During this panel/workshop/roundtable, participants will share ideas on how to make sociological course content relevant beyond the classroom and ivory tower in addition to sharing and generating ideas on how individual instructors, programs, and advisors can help students document their skills gained through the major. At the end of the session, participants should be able to leave with tangible resources for their teaching toolkit in order to help our students succeed in their transitions from college to jobs or applied graduate degrees.
