The Delaware Estuary

Can you feel the ocean’s tides in Pennsylvania? You can at Neshaminy State Park. Waves will not knock you down, but if you watch the river, you can see it rise or fall an inch in a minute or an average of seven changes of feet between low and high tides. Even though the river flows another 116 miles from here to the ocean, you are at sea level. When the tide comes in at a New Jersey beach, the water rises here also. Because tides affect this part of the river, it is called an estuary.

American Indians used the rise and fall of tides to trap fish. They built low fences in the river. At high tide, the fish swam over the top of the fence. As the tide went out, the fish were trapped and easily speared.

The Neshaminy freshwater estuary is a unique place. Plants and animals from two worlds meet here, some from the ocean and some from upstream headwaters.

TIDAL MARSH NATURAL AREA

This 71-acre state park natural area encompasses part of the freshwater intertidal zone along the shores of the Delaware River and Neshaminy Creek. This area contains wetlands and unique plants.

History

A crazy idea began at Neshaminy

For repayment of a debt to his father, William Penn received a land grant in the American Colonies from the king of England. Instead of assuming that the king’s grant gave him property rights, William Penn had what many people at the time considered a crazy idea, he would buy the land from its current inhabitants, the American Indians.

In 1682, William Penn made his first purchase from the Lenape chiefs. The land was bounded on the south by Neshaminy Creek. A year later, Penn’s second purchase was bounded on the north by Neshaminy Creek, making what is now Neshaminy State Park the core of the future Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

The major portion of today’s Neshaminy State Park was a gift to the commonwealth by Mr. Robert R. Logan. A descendant of James Logan, colonial secretary to founder William Penn, Robert Logan’s estate “Saronia” was given to the state upon his death in 1956. The property had been a wedding gift to Mr. Logan and his wife, the former Sarah Wesherril of Philadelphia, by the bride’s parents. The Logan’s home has been removed, but many of their furnishings and belongings are now in the collections of the Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission.

Dunks Ferry Road, forming the eastern boundary of the park, is one of the oldest roads in Pennsylvania. Beginning in 1679, Daniel Williams operated a ferry across the Delaware River. The road gave travelers access to his ferry, and today, over three hundred years later, “Dunks Ferry” Road perpetuates both his name and enterprise.

During the mid-1700’s, a large inn was built to serve travelers. Operated by many owners over the years, the Dunks Ferry Inn had a colorful history. One of the most successful owners was John Vandergrift, who also had a profitable shipping business for thirty-nine years during the late 1800’s.
